The hypothesis that iron may play a role in the pathogenesis of cardiovascular disease was formulated shortly after the discovery that free iron accumulates in atherosclerotic plaques. However, the epidemiological evidence supporting a positive association between iron stores and cardiovascular risk is weak and inconsistent. In-vitro evidence shows that iron could affect atherogenesis by promoting oxidation of LDL-cholesterol and by increasing thrombus formation. A complex relationship between iron and antioxidants may exist; however, there is evidence that iron can upregulate antioxidant defences by increasing the expression of transferrin receptors, and by enhancing activity of glutathione reductase. These findings may explain some inconsistencies between epidemiological studies and raise the possibility that iron levels may be reduced in some pathological states. Further research is needed to elucidate the mechanisms underlying the epidemiological association between iron stores and cardiovascular risk and to define the clinical implications of manipulating iron homeostasis.
